

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

INTRODUCTION.

The parentage, date of birth, and many other details in the life of Geoffrey Chaucer, the "Father of English Poetry," are involved in more or less obscurity, and those mentioned in the following brief biography, although in accordance with the best authorities, must not all be regarded as unquestionably established. He was born probably in 1340 (not in 1328, as formerly believed). His father was John Chaucer, a wealthy vintner, evidently of some social standing, since in 1338 he was in attendance on King Edward III. Geoffrey was liberally educated. Both Cambridge and Oxford claim him as a student, and it is probable that he attended both universities, a practice not uncommon with scholars of his day. "At the period of his leaving Oxford," says Leland, "he was already an acute dialectician, a persuasive orator, an elegant poet, a grave philosopher, an able mathematician, and an accomplished divine."

In 1357 he was in the king's service as page in the household of Lionel, third son of Edward III.; and in 1359 he served in the army that invaded France, where he was taken prisoner, but soon after released, the king paying sixteen pounds toward his ransom.

During the next seven years no mention is made of him in any of the records. Still, it is probable that he was active during this time, since in 1\(^1_367\) a life pension of twenty marks was granted him for services rendered and to be rendered his sovereign. In the same year he was appointed valet of the king's chamber,—a position of no mean honor. In 1368, on the death of Prince Lionel, he entered the service of the latter's brother, John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, who became the poet's best friend and patron. About this time he is believed to have married Philippa Roet, eldest daughter of Sir Payne Roet, and sister of Catherine Roet, who later became the third wife of the duke of Lancaster.

From this time for many years his name appears frequently in the public records. An interesting entry is that of April 23, 1374, when a pitcher of wine daily was granted him for life, to be delivered into his hands by the king's butler. This was a perquisite of what came to be in later years the office of poet laureate. Between the years 1370 and 1380 he was sent abroad upon several different diplomatic missions. In the second of these, in 1372 and 1373, he is thought to have visited the poet Petrarch, at that time living near Padua. (See Prologue to "The Clerkes Tale.")

The public services of Chaucer were not confined to diplomacy, for he held important positions in the civil service of the government. In 1374 he was appointed controller of the customs of wool, skins, and leather at the port of London. This was by no means a sinecure, as he was required to keep the records in person. He no doubt earned the appointment by previous services earnestly and properly performed. To this office there was added, in 1382, the controllership of petty customs, and in 1385 he was allowed the rare privilege of having a deputy to perform his duties as controller. In 1386 he was elected knight of the shire of Kent, in the Parliament held at Westminster; but later in the same year, for some not definitely explained cause, he gave up or was dismissed from his offices. It may be mentioned as a coincidence that his patron, John of Gaunt, sailed in August of this year to Spain, and it is possible that during his absence political influence of an adverse character operated to deprive Chaucer of his offices. This seems likely because in 1389, when Henry of Lancaster, son of John of Gaunt, had become a power in the government, Chaucer was made clerk of the king's works at Westminster and at as many as fifteen other places in personal possession of the crown. At any rate, his fortunes seem to have risen and fallen with those of the house of Lancaster. In 1394 he was granted by King Richard II. a pension of twenty pounds a year for life. It appears that in the succeeding years of his life he was in financial distress, as he often drew his pension in advance, and letters of protection were issued against his arrest and imprisonment for debt.

Although the granting of the pension of twenty pounds for life, and a tun of wine yearly, indicates that Richard II. was not unfriendly to the poet, his fortunes did not take a decided turn for the better until the accession of Henry IV., in 1399; then his pension was at once doubled.

But this new era of prosperity was not to be of long continuance. In 1399 Chaucer took a fifty-three years' lease of a house in the garden of St. Mary's Chapel in Westminster, where he died in 1400. "He was buried in the great cathedral near which in his last days he lived. He was the first, and for centuries the only one, of the many men of letters whose mortal remains have found a resting place in this great mausoleum of the illustrious dead of England."

The following description of Chaucer's personality is taken from Charles Cowden Clarke's "Life of Chaucer":

"The person of Chaucer was of middle stature, in advanced years inclining to corpulency. His face was full and smooth, betokening regular, good health and a serene and cheerful frame of mind. His complexion was fair, verging toward paleness; his hair was of a dusky yellow, short and thin; that of his beard grew—or rather, perhaps, it was fashioned—into a forked shape, and its color was wheaten. He had an expansive and marble-like forehead, fair and unwrinkled; his eyes constantly tended toward the ground. The general expression of his countenance combined a mixture of animation, of lurking good-natured satire, of unruffled serenity, sweetness, and close thought. His features were an index of his temper, and this comprised a mixture of the lively, grave, and modest. Yet was the gayety of his disposition more prominent in his writings than in his general demeanor, which, it may be, was repressed by his modesty.

"During his relaxations from the duties of public business he continually retired to his study. Reading, indeed, was his chief delight, as appears, by his own confession, in the introduction to his 'Dream' and to the 'Legend of Good Women.' He preferred it to every amusement, with the exception of a morning walk in Maytide. He lived almost exclusively in his own world of meditation, never interfering, as he says of himself, in the concerns of others. He was temperate and regular in his diet; he 'arose with the lark, and lay down with the lamb': hence the marvelous truth and freshness of his early morning pictures.

"The career of Chaucer, from whichever point we view it, assumes a character elevated above that of ordinary men. He was a poet, a philosopher, an astronomer, a logician, a linguist, a politician, a theologian, a humanist, a gentleman in the modern acceptation of the term, and a virtuous man. His conduct as a man holding a public office stands unimpeached for integrity. He was a gentleman, for he was the universal theme of admiration in a refined court, particularly by the women, and they rarely err in making a correct estimate of a man's temper and habits."

It is almost entirely as a poet, however, and as the poet of real life, that Chaucer commands our attention and secures our admiration. Like Shakespeare, Chaucer invented almost nothing. Whatever he found of use to him he took, and made of it as purely an original thing as if he himself had first found or invented it. As has been before remarked, he was a man of wide reading, and his æsthetic temperament and dramatic insight led him to discern whatever there was of poetic value in mediæval song, priestly legend, romance of chivalry, tales of travelers, fable, or allegory; but whatever he took from others as a basis of his literary work he ennobled by his genius until the original was eclipsed by the imperishable form into which he fashioned it.

The earlier literary life of Chaucer shows little English influence, except perhaps in the way of suggestion of subject. John Gower (1330–1408) was his contemporary and personal friend; but Gower was himself an imitator, and it is more probable that Gower owes his reputation to his connection with Chaucer than that Chaucer owes any part of his fame to his association with Gower. "The Tale of the Man of Lawe" and "The Tale of the Wyf of Bathe," which are supposed by some to have been borrowed by Chaucer from Gower, were common property which had come down from past ages in the form of popular legends; and it is not even certain that Gower had incorporated them in his tedious "Confessio Amantis" before Chaucer put them into the form in which they afterwards appeared in his "Canterbury Tales." Moreover, Chaucer had established his standing as a great and original national poet long before Gower had published his first English poem; and it is more likely that the latter profited by imitating, as well as he could, the style of Chaucer, than that Chaucer was, in that respect at least, influenced by Gower.

Another of his contemporaries was William Langland (1330-1400), author of the alliterative poem, "The Vision of Piers Plowman." The vices of the nobility and the clergy, the abuses and corruptions in government and church, are the theme of his verses, presented to us in allegorical form. "It is a querulous, somber, harsh, and gloomy picture, such as would appeal to the middle classes, who, with their wealth, had not acquired strength of character enough to resist successfully the oppressions of their political and priestly masters." If Chaucer saw anything in "The Vision of Piers Plowman," he saw what to avoid, both in matter and in manner. As a discreet man of the world, and closely associated with nobles, princes, and kings, he would of course avoid all hostile comment on the doings of the lords temporal, and no mention is made by him of the lords spiritual of the time. If he satirizes the vices of the clergy, he does it in such a good-humored way that the sting of it is softened by its geniality. Moreover, "the circulation of 'The Vision of Piers Plowman' among the educated classes was obstructed by its poetic form; for the deliberate opinion and taste of the educated public had condemned alliterative and rhythmic verses as a barbaric relic of an age of inferior culture."

Another of his great contemporaries was John Wyclif (1324-1384). "As a theologian he was the most eminent of his day, as a philosopher second to none, and as a schoolman incomparable." His writings, in the homely speech of the humble classes, were an intellectual stimulus to the common people, but they were not read or studied as models of literary style. Chaucer doubtless sympathized with the aims of both the secular priest who has given us "The Vision of Piers Plowman," and the eminent theologian and lecturer at Oxford who has given us the first English Bible,—as much, at least, as one moving in aristocratic circles could, and it is reasonably certain that a man of his keenness of mind would avail himself of whatever aid their writings could bring him; but it seems that this aid was rather linguistic than purely literary.

From these considerations, then, it may appear that the earliest literary influence upon Chaucer came from abroad. It is a reasonable conjecture that he was as well acquainted with Norman French, the court language, as he was with his native tongue, and he must have been familiar with the writings of contemporary French authors and of those who immediately preceded them.

Among his works of this period are "The Romaunt of the Rose," "The Book of the Duchesse," an entirely original poem, and a few minor pieces. He is, however, much more indebted to the prose writers than to the poets of France. The plot of "The Tale of the Man of Lawe" is borrowed from a French romance; that of "The Nonne Preestes Tale" from a French fable. It may, indeed, be not too much to say that French influence is found here and there, in a greater or less degree, throughout Chaucer's poetry. Taine implies that his genius is more essentially French than English.

Somewhat later in his literary life there appears a period of Italian influence. The Italian writers of this period were the greatest of the age, and have maintained their supremacy in Italian literature up to the present time. Whatever doubt may be expressed as to the direct influence of French authors on Chaucer's poetry, there is none as to the inspiration which he received from the great Italians, Dante, Petrarch, and Boccaccio. line 335 of "The Monkes Tale" he speaks of Petrarch as "my maister Petrark." "The Clerkes Tale" of patient Griseldis is from the Latin prose of Petrarch, who translated it from the "Decameron." From Boccaccio he borrows more than from either of the others, but mostly or entirely from his poetry. The "Teseide" of Boccaccio is the basis of "The Knightes Tale," which is, however, by no means a translation. The former contains 9896 lines, and the latter only 2250, and of these but 270 are literal translations, 374 are paraphrases, and 132 have only a little resemblance. The remaining two thirds of the poem is Chaucer's own invention. The "Troilus and Criseyde" of Chaucer is founded upon the "Filostrato" of Boccaccio, and he uses, as in "The Knightes Tale," about one third of the original, and at the same time expands it from 5704 lines to 8239 lines.

If Chaucer invented little, "he touched nothing that he did not adorn;" and originality consists more in the treatment of a story than in aught else. "That the poet himself should furnish his own materials as well as fashion them is no more necessary than that the sculptor should be under the necessity of personally digging the marble out of which he carves his statue."

"No poetry was ever more human than Chaucer's; none ever came more frankly and genially home to its readers. The first note of his song is a note of freshness and gladness."

"Chaucer himself is in all his original works: hopeless and sad in his early poems, bright and humorful in his later ones, poor and suppliant in his last. Among his chief characteristics are his delightful freshness and simplicity, his roguish, genial humor,—he was full of quaint fun,—his heartfelt love of nature, his tender pathos, his knowledge of women,—the naughty he quizzed in most happy style, and the good he honored and praised with all his might,—his love of his dear old books, his power of lifelike portraiture, his admirable story-telling, and the perfection of his verse. Chaucer's ardent love of nature is everywhere apparent. Even his love and reverence for books gave way before an eager desire to enjoy the beauties of nature in that season of the year when all around him was manifesting life and loveliness" (MORRIS).

Chaucer was essentially an epic poet,—one of the few really great story-tellers. He has been styled the "English Ennius" and the "English Homer," but, better than all, he is acknowledged to be the "Father of English Poetry;" and both in the long line of succeeding great names in English literature, and those of his own time, we find him mentioned with admiration, even with veneration, imitated, quoted, and translated, or rather modernized, into "very pretty poetry, perhaps, but not Chaucer." His is the "art that conceals art." If there had been no Shakespeare, Chaucer's name would surely be the greatest in our literature.

"It is strange that such a voice as this should have awakened no echo in the singers that follow; but the first burst of English song died as suddenly and utterly with Chaucer as the hope and glory of his age. The hundred years that follow the brief sunshine of Crécy and the 'Canterbury Tales' are years of the deepest gloom; no age of our history is so sad and somber as the age which we traverse from Edward III. to Joan of Arc."

Chaucer's greatest work, the "Canterbury Tales," was not put together until 1386. "It is to this work that he owes his fame and rank as the first poet of modern English literature, and in this work—the result of years of labor and study—the genius and power of the poet are best expressed." The "Canterbury Tales" form an unfinished work. In fact, the plan as originally laid out in the Prologue is beyond the compass of any merely human endeavor. We have no means of knowing positively at what different times the several tales were written, and we are alike ignorant as to the date of the Prologue, though it was probably written not earlier than 1386. It has been the humor of some to find that the plan of the work was taken from the "Decameron" of Boccaccio, whereas it may be questioned whether Chaucer received even a suggestion from the work of Boccaccio. In the latter all the characters are of the same social standing, and there is none of the dramatic interest attaching to them or their stories that we find in the great work of Chaucer. Instead of a small company of fashionable young men and women shutting themselves off from the world, Chaucer presents us to a large company, thirty-two in all, in various ranks of life, journeying together upon a pious pilgrimage to the shrine of the "holy blissful martir," Thomas à Becket, at Canterbury. To beguile the time, stories are told by these pilgrims, and these are bound together by incidents, generally narrated in the separate prologues, in such a way as to give to the whole a sort of dramatic unity.

In the Prologue, Chaucer lays before us the general plan of the work, and introduces us to the several characters. He represents himself as meeting at the Tabard Inn in Southwark (opposite London) twenty-nine pilgrims bound for Canterbury. Being on the same errand himself, he joins them, and the host of the inn decides also to make one of the party. The latter presides over the company, and suggests that the pilgrims shorten the way by telling each four stories, two on the way to, and two more on the way from, Canterbury, it being agreed that the one whose tale pleased best should receive a supper at the common cost.

"After a brief introduction, filled with the most cheerful images of spring, the season of the pilgrimage, the poet commences the narrative with a description of the person and the character of each member of the party. This description extends to about seven hundred lines, and of course affords space for a very spirited and graphic portrayal of the physical aspect and an outline of the moral features of each. This latter part of the description is generally more rapidly sketched, because it was a part of the author's plan to allow his personages to bring out their special traits of character, and thus to depict and individualize themselves, in the interludes between the tales. The selection of the pilgrims is evidently made with reference to this object of development in action, and therefore constitutes an essential feature of the plot. We have persons of all the ranks not too far removed from each other by artificial distinctions to be supposed capable of associating upon that footing of temporary equality which is the law of good fellowship among travelers bound on the same journey and accidentally brought together. All the great classes of English humanity are thus represented, and opportunity is given for the display of the harmonies and the jeal-ousies which now united, now divided, the interests of different orders and different vocations in the commonwealth. The clerical pilgrims, it will be observed, are proportionately very numerous. The exposure of the corruptions of the church was doubtless a leading aim with the poet; and if the whole series, which was designed to extend to at least one hundred and twenty-eight tales, had been completed, the criminations and recriminations of the jealous ecclesiastics would have exhibited the whole profession in an unenviable light.

"None of these sketches, I believe, has ever been traced to a foreign source; and they are so thoroughly national that it is hardly possible to suppose that any imagination but that of an Englishman could have conceived them. In the first introduction of the individuals described in the prologues to the several stories, and in the dialogues which occur at the pauses between the tales,—wherever, in short, the narrators appear in their own persons,—the characters are as well marked and discriminated, and as harmonious and consistent in action, as in the best comedies of modern times" (Marsh).

A poem on the same subject as "The Knightes Tale" was originally written by Chaucer as a separate work, under the title of "Al the love of Palamon and Arcyte of Thebes thogh the storye ys knowen lyte." The story of this poem is as follows:

Theseus, returning home to Athens with his bride Hippolyta and her young sister Emily, is met by a party of women, suppliants for his help. They implore him to punish the wicked tyrant Creon, who cruelly refuses burial to the bodies of their husbands, slain in the siege of Thebes. Theseus thereupon at once sets out for Thebes, kills Creon, and brings back two prisoners, Palamon and Arcite, cousins and sworn "brothers in arms," both of the royal line of Thebes. These he imprisons in a tower of his castle. Looking from the window of this tower one May morning, Palamon sees Emily picking flowers. Overcome with admiration, he points her out to Arcite, who at once falls in love with her. A quarrel ensues. Each is sworn to aid the other in his love adventures, but each maintains that he loved Emily first. Palamon saw her first, but, as Arcite asserts, took her for a goddess, while Arcite at once loved her as a mortal woman.

Arcite, by private influence with Theseus, is released, on condition that he shall leave Athens forever, under penalty of death for returning. Nevertheless he does return, disguised as a servant, in which capacity he engages in the service of Emily. After six years of captivity, Palamon, too, secures his liberty, escaping by night and fleeing to a wood. Here, in the morning, he encounters Arcite. Indignant reproaches follow. Arcite brings him arms, and the next day they meet to settle their claim to Emily by single combat. Theseus, however, sees them fighting, rides up, and interferes. At first he threatens both with death, but, relenting, grants them a year to gather each a troop of one hundred picked knights. At the end of this time they are to meet in a great tournament, the winner to have Emily for his wife.

Preparations are made, and at last the great day comes, and the two champions appear, each with his hundred knights. Both seek help from the gods. Arcite prays to Mars, asking for victory in the battle; Palamon, to Venus, for success in love. Both are led to believe by signs that their prayers will be granted, and they confidently prepare for battle. Meanwhile the gods have devised a plan to keep their promises to both. Arcite has his wish: he wins the battle; but as he rides along the lists, prepared to claim his reward, his horse throws him, and he is fatally injured. He dies holding Emily's hand and commending to her his rival Palamon. His body is burned with imposing ceremonies. At the end of a year of mourning Theseus summons Palamon to Athens and gives him Emily for his wife. So the prayers of both have been answered. Arcite has been victorious in battle, Palamon in love.

To read Chaucer and to understand his structural forms is not a difficult task, and he who learns to read him easily and fluently is richly rewarded for his labors. The language in his period had lost the greatest number of the inflectional forms of the Anglo-Saxon, and there had been added to it during the three centuries of Norman rule a considerable number of words from the Norman French, which language, as before remarked, was certainly as familiar to Chaucer as the English of his day.

The grammar of this language, and the rules for its pronunciation, as set forth by Tyrwhitt, are probably as nearly correct as can now be determined. According to this authority, there remained but one of the six declensions of the Anglo-Saxon, and of the great variety of cases of nouns there was left only the genitive, which was formed from the nominative by adding es; and the same form expresses the plural in all cases, e.g.: Nominative, lond; genitive, londes; plural, londes. Nom., name; gen., names; plural, names. Nom., man; gen., mannes; plural, mannes.

The personal pronouns were declined as follows: Nom., I, Ich, Ik, we; gen., min (myn), mi (my), our, oure; dat. and acc., me, us. Nom., thou (thow), ye; gen., thin (thyn), thi (thy), your, youre; dat. and acc., thee, the, yow, you. Nom., he, she, hit, it, thei, they; gen., his, hire, hir, here (her, hir); dat. and acc., him, hir, hire, here, hit, it, hem. Who was both relative and interrogative, as now, and had a genitive, whos, and an accusative, whom, but no variety of number; while the demonstratives this and that had plural forms, thise and tho, but no case. Eyther, nexther, other (Latin, alier), had plurals regularly formed by adding es; other (Latin, alius) had a genitive case and plural number after the analogy of nouns. Aller was the genitive plural of alle.

Verbs had four modes, and but two principal tenses, present and past. Varieties of mode and tense were expressed by auxiliaries. The inflection of verbs differed but little from the present custom. The termination -en signified the plural of a finite verb as well as of the infinitive mode, and the past participle ended in ed, d, or t, except in strong verbs, in which it ended in en or e, e.g., "So had I spoken."

The auxiliary verbs were used in the two primary tenses in the indicative and subjunctive modes. They were prefixed to the infinitive of the principal verb, and inflected as other verbs, e.g.: I shall, will (wol) loven. I may (mow), can (con) loven. We shullen, willen (wollen), connen loven. In the past tense, I shulde (shulled), wolde (wulled), mighte (moughte), coude loven. The auxiliary to haven was used as a prefix to form perfect, and pluperfect tenses. The auxiliary to ben ("to be") was used to form the passive voice of all verbs.

A few verbs from the French, notwithstanding the fact that when they were adopted into the English language they lost all their differences of conjugation, retained the termination -ant of the present participle.

The past participle of weak, or regular, verbs had the Anglo-Saxon ending -d or -ed, and of strong, irregular, verbs the ending -en or -e, to which was frequently prefixed the particle i or y.

The negatives were: nam for ne am, am not; nis for ne is, is not; nas, was not; nere, were not; nadde, nad, had not, nath, hath not; nil, nille, will not; nolde, would not; noot, know not; niste, knew not; ne — ne, neither — nor.

Final e was a separate syllable, except in personal pronouns, but was elided before a word beginning with a vowel or an h mute, unless the exigencies of the meter prevented. Final es, ed, en, de were generally pronounced. Words of French origin were accented upon the ultimate or penultimate syllable.

The Prologue to the "Canterbury Tales," the separate prologues to each tale, and most of the tales in verse ("The Tale of Melibeus" and "The Persones Tale" are in prose) are written in iambic pentameter verse with riming couplets. Often we find lines of eleven syllables, the last being unaccented, and occasionally a line of nine syllables.

There are no less than seven different MSS. of Chaucer's works, which differ considerably in the spelling and to some extent in the wording. The text in this book is taken from the edition by Rev. Richard Morris, LL.D., which is based mainly on the Ellesmere MS.

Whylom,² as olde stories tellen us,
Ther was a duk that highte³ Theseus; ⁴
Of Athenes he was lord and governour,⁵
And in his tyme swich a conquerour,
That gretter was ther noon under the sonne.
Ful many a riche contree hadde he wonne;
That with his wisdom and his chivalrye
He conquered al the regne of Femenye,⁶
That whylom was y-cleped Scithia; ⁷
And weddede the queen Ipolita,
And broghte hir hoom with him in his contree
With muchel glorie and greet solempnitee,
And eek hir yonge suster Emelye.
And thus with victorie and with melodye

^{1 &}quot;And now the joyous sound of applause heralds the coming of Theseus in his laurel-crowned chariot to his paternal home, after the fierce battles with the Scythian people." ² Once. ⁸ Was named. ⁴ Theseus, in Greek legend a hero who became king of Athens, was famed for many valorous deeds. He subdued the Amazons, a race of warlike women, and led their queen, Hippolyta, to Athens as his bride. Scythia, the home of the Amazons, was a cold region of indefinite extent north of the Black Sea. ⁵ Accented on last syllable, as is usual with Norman-French words. So also "conquerour," "chivalrye," etc. ⁶ The kingdom of the Amazons. ⁷ Scythia.

Lete I this noble duk to Athenes ryde, I 5 And al his hoost, in armes him bisyde. And certes, if it nere 1 to long to here, I wolde han told yow fully the manere. How wonnen was the regne of Femenye By Theseus, and by his chivalrye: 20 And of the grete bataille for the nones Bitwixen Athenes and the Amazones: And how asseged was Ipolita, The faire hardy queen of Scithia: And of the feste that was at hir weddinge. 25 And of the tempest at hir hoom-cominge; But al that thing I moot as now 2 forbere. I have, God woot, a large feeld to ere,3 And wayke 4 been the oxen in my plough, The remenant of the tale is long ynough; 30 I wol nat letten eek noon of this route,5 Lat every felawe telle his tale aboute, And lat see now who shal the soper winne, And ther I lefte, I wol ageyn biginne.6 This duk, of whom I make mencioun, 35 When he was come almost unto the toun. ¹ Polynices, with six confederates, led an unsuccessful attack against Thebes (one of the powerful cities of ancient Greece) for the throne held by his brother. Capaneus, one of the seven leaders, having boasted that even Jupiter, the king of the gods, could not hold him back, was struck dead by a thunderbolt while scaling the walls. Both Polynices and his brother having fallen in the encounter, the tyrant Creon succeeded to the throne of Thebes.

2 Died. 3 Out of spite or vexation. 4 To do outrage to the dead bodies.

5 With the Greeks burial was a solemn duty. Until the funeral rites were performed the souls of the dead were believed to wander homeless upon the earth. "Y-brent," burned. 6 "But with their lifeless limbs his hounds are fed" (DRYDEN). 7 Without more delay. 8 Fell flat with face to the ground.

Explicit secunda pars. Sequitur pars tercia.

I trowe men wolde deme it necligence, If I foryete to tellen the dispence Of Theseus, that goth so busily 1025 To maken up the listes roially; 2 That swich a noble theatre as it was, I dar wel seyn that in this world ther nas. The circuit a myle was aboute, Walled of stoon, and diched al with-oute. 1030 Round was the shap, in manere of compas, Ful of degrees,3 the heighte of sixty pas, That, whan a man was set on o degree, He lette 4 nat his felawe for to see. Est-ward ther stood a gate of marbel whyt, 1035 West-ward, right swich another in the opposit.

1 Every person. 2 Royally. 3 Steps rising one above another. 4 Hindered,

And shortly to concluden, swich a place Was noon in erthe, as in so litel space;

For in the lond ther nas no crafty man, That geometrie or ars-metrik 1 can. 1040 Ne portrevour, ne kervere of images, That Theseus ne yaf him mete and wages The theatre for to maken and devyse. And for to doon his ryte and sacrifyse, He est-ward hath up-on the gate above, 1045 In worship of Venus, goddesse of love, Doon make an auter 2 and an oratorie: And west-ward, in the mynde and in memorie Of Mars, he maked hath right swich another, That coste largely of gold a fother.3 1050 And north-ward, in a touret on the wal. Of alabastre whyt and reed coral An oratorie riche for to see. In worship of Dyane of chastitee, Hath Theseus doon wroght in noble wyse. 1055 But yet hadde I foryeten to devyse The noble kerving, and the portreitures, The shap, the contenaunce, and the figures, That weren in thise oratories thre. First in the temple of Venus maystow se TO60 Wroght on the wal,4 ful pitous to biholde, The broken slepes, and the sykes colde; The sacred teres, and the waymenting; The fyry strokes of the desiring, That loves servaunts in this lyf enduren; 1065 The othes, that hir covenants assuren;5 Plesaunce and hope, desyr, fool-hardinesse, Beautee and youthe, bauderie, richesse, Charmes and force, lesinges,6 flaterye, Dispense,7 bisynesse, and Ielousye, 1070

Afterwards, according to one version of the legend, she and her son Arcas were slain by Diana and changed by Jupiter to stars. 5 The nymph Daphne, daughter of the river god Peneus, being pursued by Apollo, who loved her, besought Diana to transform her into a laurel tree, and her prayer was granted.

Ther saugh I Attheon 1 an hert v-maked. For vengeaunce that he saugh Diane al naked; I saugh how that his houndes have him caught. ¹ Actæon, in Greek mythology, a hunter who, having seen Diana while bathing, was changed by her into a stag and torn to pieces by his own dogs. ² Further on. ³ The Calydonian hunt was the chase for a savage boar sent by Diana to punish Œneus, king of Calydon (a city in western Greece), for a neglect of sacrifice. Meleager, or Œnides (son of Œneus), slew the boar, and gave the head and hide, the "prize," to the beautiful huntress Atalanta, who had been the first to strike the boar. Diana provoked a contest over the prize, during which Meleager slew his mother's brothers. She, in revenge, burned the log whereon depended her son's life, and he died a sudden death. ⁴ Not call to mind. ⁵ Under the title of Lucina, Diana was worshiped by the Romans as the goddess who presided over childbirth. ⁶ Lifelike. ⁷ Colors.

¹ Stop. 2 Father of Jupiter, and god of agriculture. This description of Saturn is due to a confusion of the god with the planet. It was the influence of the planet, not of the god, that was considered baleful. For Italy was called Saturnia, or "Land of Plenty," in honor of Saturn, who taught the people agriculture and introduced among them civilization and morality.

Al is to-brosten thilke regioun, Nature hath now no dominacioun. 1000 And certeynly, ther nature wol nat wirche,1 Fare-wel, phisyk! go ber the man to chirche.2 This al and som,3 that Arcita moot dye, For which he sendeth after Emelye, And Palamon, that was his cosin dere; 1905 Than seyde he thus, as ye shul after here. "Naught may the woful spirit in myn herte Declare o poynt of alle my sorwes smerte To yow, my lady, that I love most; But I biquethe the service of my gost 4 1910 To yow aboven every creature, Sin that my lyf ne may no lenger dure. Allas, the wo! allas, the peynes stronge, That I for yow have suffred, and so longe! Allas, the deeth! allas, myn Emelye! 1915 Allas, departing of our compaignye! Allas, myn hertes quene! allas, my wyf! Myn hertes lady, endere 5 of my lyf! What is this world? what asketh men to have? Now with his love, now in his colde grave 1920 Allone, with-outen any compaignye. Fare-wel, my swete fo! 6 myn Emelye! And softe tak me in your armes tweye, For love of God, and herkneth what I seve. I have heer with my cosin Palamon 1925 Had stryf and rancour, many a day a-gon, For love of yow, and for my Ielousye. And Iupiter so wis my soule gye,7 To speken of a servant proprely, With alle circumstaunces trewely, 1930

7 So willed to guide my soul.

That is to sevn, trouthe, honour, and knighthede. Wisdom, humblesse, estaat, and heigh kinrede, Fredom, and al that longeth to that art. So Iupiter have of my soule part. As in this world right now ne knowe I non 1935 So worthy to be loved as Palamon. That serveth vow, and wol doon al his lyf. And if that evere ye shul been a wyf, Forvet nat Palamon, the gentil man." And with that word his speche faille gan.1 1940 For fro his feet up to his brest was come The cold of deeth, that hadde him overcome. And yet more-over, in his armes two The vital strengthe is lost, and al ago. Only the intellect, with-outen more, 1945 That dwelled in his herte syk and sore, Gan faillen, when the herte felte deeth, Dusked 2 his even two, and failled breeth. But on his lady yet caste he his yë; His laste word was, "mercy, Emelye!" 1950 His spirit chaunged hous, and wente ther, As I cam nevere, I can nat tellen wher.3 Therfor I stinte, I nam no divynistre; Of soules fynde I nat in this registre,

¹ Cf. Dryden's description of the last moments of Arcite:

"This was his last; for death came on amain,
And exercised below his iron reign;
Then upward to the seat of life he goes:
Sense fled before him, what he touched he froze:
Yet could he not his closing eye withdraw,
Though less and less of Emily he saw:
So, speechless for a little space he lay;
Then grasped the hand he held, and sighed his soul away."

2 Grew dark or dim.

3 "The soul of Arcite went where heathens go, Who better live than we, though less they know." (DRYDEN).

Ne me ne list thilke opiniouns to telle 1955 Of hem, though that they wryten wher they dwelle. Arcite is cold, ther Mars his soule gve:1 Now wol I speken forth of Emelye. Shrighte² Emelye, and howleth Palamon, And Theseus his suster took anon 1960 Swowninge, and bar hir fro the corps away. What helpeth it to tarien 8 forth the day, To tellen how she weep, bothe eve and morwe? For in swich cas wommen can have swich sorwe. Whan that hir housbonds been from hem ago, 1965 That for the more part they sorwen so, Or elles fallen in swich maladye, That at the laste certevnly they dye. Infinite been the sorwes and the teres Of olde folk, and folk of tendre veres, 1970 In al the toun, for deeth of this Theban, For him ther wepeth bothe child and man; So greet a weping was ther noon certayn, Whan Ector 4 was y-broght, al fresh y-slayn, To Troye; allas! the pitee that was ther, 1975 Cracching 5 of chekes, rending eek of heer. "Why woldestow be deed," thise wommen crye, "And haddest gold ynough, and Emelye?" No man mighte gladen Theseus, Savinge his olde fader Egeus, 1980 That knew this worldes transmutacioun.

As he had seen it chaungen up and doun, Ioye after wo, and wo after gladnesse: ⁶ And shewed hem ensamples and lyknesse.

"Right as ther deved nevere man," quod he, "That he ne livede in erthe in som degree. Right so ther livede nevere man," he seyde, "In al this world, that som tyme he ne devde. This world nis but a thurghfare ful of wo,1 And we ben pilgrimes, passinge to and fro: 1990 Deeth is an ende of every worldly sore." And over al this yet seyde he muchel more To this effect, ful wysly to enhorte The peple, that they sholde hem reconforte. Duk Theseus, with al his bisy cure.2 1995 Caste 3 now wher that the sepulture Of good Arcite may best v-maked be. And eek most honurable in his degree. And at the laste he took conclusioun. That ther as first Arcite and Palamoun 2000 Hadden for love the bataille hem bitwene. That in that selve 4 grove, swote and grene, Ther as he hadde his amorous desyres, His compleynt, and for love his hote fyres, He wolde make a fyr, in which thoffice 5 2005 Funeral he mighte al accomplice; And leet 6 comaunde anon to hakke 7 and hewe The okes olde, and leve hem on a rewe In colpons 8 wel arrayed for to brenne; His officers with swifte feet they renne, 2010 And ryde anon at his comaundement. And after this, Theseus hath y-sent After a bere,9 and it al over-spradde With cloth of gold, the richest that he hadde.

Cf. Dryden:

"Like pilgrims to the appointed place we tend:
The world's an inn, and death the journey's end."

And of the same suyte he cladde Arcite;
Upon his hondes hadde he gloves whyte;
Eek on his heed a coroune of laurer grene,
And in his hond a swerd ful bright and kene.
He leyde him bare the visage 1 on the bere,
Therwith he weep that pitee was to here.
And for the peple sholde seen him alle,
Whan it was day, he broghte him to the halle,
That roreth of the crying and the soun.

Here is ended the Knightes Tale.

1 Vexation. 2 The last ten lines of Dryden's Palamon and Arcite read:

"All of a tenor was their after life,

No day discolored with domestic strife;

No jealousy, but mutual truth believed,

Secure repose, and kindness undeceived.

Thus Heaven, beyond the compass of his thought,

Sent him the blessing he so dearly bought.

So may the Queen of Love long duty bless,

And all true lovers find the same success."

INTRODUCTION TO AMERICAN LITERATURE

By BRANDER MATTHEWS, A.M., LL.B., Professor of Literature, Columbia University. Price, $1.00

EX-PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT, in a most appreciative review in The Bookman, says: "The book is a piece of work as good of its kind as any American scholar has ever had in his hands. the kind of book that should be given to a beginner, because it will give him a clear idea of what to read, and of the relative importance of the authors he is to read; yet it is much more than merely a book for beginners. Any student of the subject who wishes to do good work hereafter must not only read Mr. Matthews' book, but must largely adopt Mr. Matthews' way of looking at things, for these simply written, unpretentious chapters are worth many times as much as the ponderous tomes which contain what usually passes for criticism; and the principles upon which Mr. Matthews insists with such quiet force and good taste are those which must be adopted, not only by every student of American writings, but by ever American writer, if he is going to do what is really worth . In short, Mr. Matthews has produced doing. an admirable book, both in manner and matter, and has made a distinct addition to the very literature of which he writes."

¶ The book is amply provided with pedagogical features. Each chapter includes questions for review, bibliographical notes, facsimiles of manuscripts, and portraits, while at the end of the volume is a brief chronology of American literature.

AMERICAN BOOK COMPANY

COMPOSITION-RHETORIC

By STRATTON D. BROOKS, Superintendent of Schools, Boston, Mass., and MARIETTA HUB-BARD, formerly English Department, High School, La Salle, Ill. Price, $1.00

THE fundamental aim of this volume is to enable pupils to express their thoughts freely, clearly, and forcibly. At the same time it is designed to cultivate literary appreciation, and to develop some knowledge of rhetorical theory. The work follows closely the requirements of the College Entrance Examination Board, and of the New York State Education Department.

¶ In Part One are given the elements of description, narration, exposition, and argument; also special chapters on letter-writing and poetry. A more complete and comprehensive treatment of the four forms of discourse already discussed is furnished in Part Two. In each part is presented a series of themes covering these subjects, the purpose being to give the pupil inspiration, and that confidence in himself which comes from the frequent repetition of an act. A single new principle is introduced into each theme, and this is developed in the text, and illustrated by carefully selected examples.

¶ The pupils are taught how to correct their own errors, and also how to get the main thought in preparing their lessons. Careful coördination with the study of literature and with other school studies is made throughout the book.

The modern character of the illustrative extracts can not fail to interest every boy and girl. Concise summaries are given following the treatment of the various forms of discourse, and toward the end of the book there is a very comprehensive and compact summary of grammatical principles. More than usual attention is devoted to the treatment of argument.

DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE OF HIGH SCHOOL AND COLLEGE TEXTBOOKS

Published Complete and in Sections

WE issue a Catalogue of High School and College Textbooks, which we have tried to make as valuable and as useful to teachers as possible. In this catalogue are set forth briefly and clearly the scope and leading characteristics of each of our best textbooks. In most cases there are also given testimonials from well-known teachers, which have been selected quite as much for their descriptive qualities as for their value as commendations.

¶ For the convenience of teachers this Catalogue is also published in separate sections treating of the various branches of study. These pamphlets are entitled: English, Mathematics, History and Political Science, Science, Modern Languages, Ancient Languages, and Philosophy and Education.

¶ Teachers seeking the newest and best books for their classes are invited to send for our Complete High School and College Catalogue, or for such sections as may be of greatest interest.

Topies of our price lists, or of special circulars, in which these books are described at greater length than the space limitations of the catalogue permit, will be mailed to any address on request. Address all correspondence to the nearest office of the company.
